Dissertation Research: (Funded)

Patterns of Questioning During Traffic Stops: A Study of Possible Racial/Ethnic Profiling.

Served as primary investigator conducting empirical research study for the Nebraska State Patrol (NSP) designed to inform formal policy and practice regarding vehicle stops and searches. In particular, the goal of the research was to help understand and address a pattern previously identified by the NSP itself, that while vehicles driven by racial/ethnic minority drivers are searched more often than those driven by Anglo/White drivers, they are less likely to contain contraband.

For this project I constructed the data collection instruments, gathered, and cleaned this original police/citizen interaction observational data set and conducted quantitative analysis of the data.

Master's Thesis Research: (Funded by competitive grant)

Latino Police Officers: Negotiating the Police Role

Served as primary investigator conducting empirical research study designed to inform policy and practice concerning the goals of community policing, particularly assumptions regarding minority officers, ethnic identity and minority community attachment. With the support of the Omaha Police Department (OPD) and the Latino Police Officers' Association (LPOA) I gained voluntary consent and conducted in-depth interviews with 100% of Latino police officers employed by OPD (N=34).

For this project I constructed the consent forms, data collection instruments, gathered, and cleaned this original data set and conducted qualitative analysis of the data.
